

Wang Chen, 23 years old, freelance. Stock trading for 4 years. The funds for stock trading were given by his parents, and due to his previous experience of losing money, he did not dare to follow up on this market trend. Wang Chen believes that companies with high market value in the Chinese stock market are often not technology companies that young people like, which does not match the expectations of national development. Currently, he is not particularly optimistic about the Chinese stock market.

Li Jingye, 81 years old, has been trading stocks for more than 20 years. Currently, his vision is very poor. He believes that the Chinese stock market has been around for more than 30 years and should gradually improve overall. Mr. Li usually follows international and domestic news and believes that the current situation is generally good for China's development. He believes that the country's development expectations will drive the stock market to develop positively. The number of stocks and the total amount of funds have increased significantly compared to before, making it difficult to make the right choices. Currently, the overall market trend is neither profitable nor unprofitable.

Shen Songmei, 75 years old. I have been trading stocks for over ten years. Believing that the country is currently in a favorable situation and the market will gradually improve is a slow bull market. Ms. Shen has invested relatively little capital in stocks and usually only deals with low-priced stocks. She has a rational approach to stock speculation and closes her business when she sees a good opportunity. Overall, it has been earned over the years.

Song Yilin, 57 years old, has over ten years of experience in stock trading. Ms. Song believes that the Chinese stock market is still a policy market. It is important to interpret government policies when trading stocks in China. Technical indicators are post installed and must be based on policies first, which are pre installed. Believe that the Chinese stock market is not sufficiently market-oriented. Due to family reasons, the stock market was liquidated before this market trend.
